The ne-plus-ultra of panel inscriptions is lettering etched into a metal panel. I happened to get a Micro-Mark ad mail today touting their etching kit is discounted to $80. The kit is for making small parts via photo etching. Ferric chloride is the etchant and the metals used are copper and brass. So I wonder how such a process would work on zinc, steel and aluminiumumm. Any thoughts from the chemcal literati?

Would probably be easier, cheaper, safer to get it laser engraved

Well folks
Here is yet another example of a fool and his money, or maybe a fool with too much money
I know of a guy who thinks this was worth every penny of $6800

For $6800, you'd think he could at least get the printed
"wood grain" plastic laminate on straight.

I like this meaningless statement:

"....The ultra low impedance of the SRTP gives you the ultimate in dynamics especially at low levels seemingly a major drawback with resistive based solutions. ..."

That's what I want, maximum dynamics with the volume turned to zero.
Uuuggghhhh! This is typical of how political propagandists and advertisers rearrange one's mind without telling anything useful.

Maybe if the audiophooles would put there heads inside an airtight container and then evacuate it they could have the ultimate experience in low noise and exceptional dynamics - they couldn't hear their heads explode....
